People:

Janis Dofner was a heritage tourism pro. Michael Dedolph was a computer guy who'd rather be cooking or administering a massage. The husband-and-wife team wanted to profit from the business boom along the Great Allegheny Passage. It so happened The Progress Fund was seeking a buyer for the B&B which it had helped open but was now threatened by the developers' problems at other sites. Hearing Meyersdale residents talk about their trailside town's beloved centerpiece, the palace of the long-gone timber baron, sealed it for Janis and Michael. "How can you not love something that is so authentic," asks Janis, "and so beloved by the community?"

Progress:

The Progress Fund bought out the bank that was part of the financing for the original developer. The Progress Fund ran the B&B, checked the numbers and proved it could turn a profit. So The Progress Fund loaned Janis and Michael $405,151 – enough to buy the building and start transforming the third floor ball room into an owners' apartment.

Impact:

Janis is revamping the Levi Deal's marketing program, while Michael launches a massage sideline and plans a pizzeria-style eatery. Together, they aim to turn the town's grand dame into a siren luring trail users. "They'll come in from out of town, off the trail," says Michael, "and this is what they're going to remember about Meyersdale."

The Progress Fund is an equal opportunity provider and employer.
